Journey into the unknown...

A JOURNEY of a thousand miles starts with In fact it's just less than a hundred miles (96 to be precise) from the start point of the West Highland Way to its finish point, the now famous seat at the end of Fort William's main drag.

Out of Milngavie rail station the Way leads into the centre of the Dunbartonshire town (passing provision points a'plenty) before heading off into the country and along the Bonnie, Bonnie banks of Scotland's deepest loch before climbing into the hills and that celebrated cross roads of road and rail – Crianlarich, where all roads seem to lead and where the West Highland Line leads off to Fort William, with a handy branch line to Oban.

Before you leave the station – and pick up your copy of this paper – look out for the handy coffee stall just by the exit gate.

Full steam ahead – sometimes

SADLY, the sight of a steam train on the West Highland Line is not a very common one, but there are occasions during the year when engine and carriages wend their way up from the South to take up their duties hauling the Jacobite steam train along the 'Harry Potter' route from Fort William to Mallaig. But regular – if less romantic – diesel services run the length of the line offering all sorts of options to 'cheat' and save shoe leather for a few easy miles.

Open 7 days, 7.30am–7pm

A friendly, exceptionally well stocked licensed mini-supermarket. Also first aid and outdoor essentials and an ATM (accepts all cards).

Souvenir Map of the Wa

This amusing and informative specially drawn map of the West Highland Way is covered. Copies are available from outlets on the way or send £3.50 (p.p.)

THANKS TO the practice of ‘greenwashing,’ many supposedly environmentally beneficial measures are nothing of the sort. Kinlochleven is a different matter. The far-sighted hydro scheme that established the aluminium smelter there last century still churns out the most genuine green power, day in, day out.
